

Coming of Age in Montgomery, Alabama in 1968

Southern author Leah Harper Bowron pens a “Wonder-like” story of resilience in the face of discrimination and bullying, set nearly 50 years ago in the wake of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and Sen. Bobby Kennedy’s assassinations

Colorblind: A Novel by Leah Harper Bowron

The time was 1968. The place was Montgomery, Alabama. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and Sen. Bobby Kennedy had been assassinated. War was raging in Vietnam. And war was raging on the playground of the all-white Wyatt Elementary School.

Schoolyard bullies teased sixth grader Lisa Parker because of the way her nose looked. Lisa would often develop a stomachache and go home from school to escape the bullies. Until sixth grade teacher Miss Annie Loomis came to Wyatt. Miss Loomis just happened to be the first African-American at Wyatt, and Lisa loved her English class. Now, when the bullies teased Lisa, she would stay in school so that she could be in Miss Loomis’ class. Yet something terrible happened that would change Lisa and Miss Loomis forever.

Racism reared its ugly head at Wyatt, and now Lisa was not the only victim of the bullies’ teasing. Would Miss Loomis endure the bullies’ racist taunts?

A scholar of James Joyce, and former lawyer from Birmingham, Alabama, author Leah Harper Bowron writes her debut young adult novel, Colorblind, a coming-of-age story of resilience in the face of discrimination and bullying.

Leah has lived her book Colorblind in so many ways. She was born with cleft palate and cleft lip, and found solace from schoolyard bullies in her sixth-grade English class, until her teacher started receiving racial taunts. A fictionalized version of Leah’s coming of age in Montgomery, Colorblind takes us back in time 50 years to address racism, physical challenges and bullying.
